

The Birthday Card Dilemma

A birthday card arrives in the post. It has your address on it, but not your name. You open it. The birthday card has a £20 note inside it. The card inside reads, "Happy birthday, Lots of love Auntie Janet x." You do not have an Auntie Janet. Auntie Janet has put her address on the back of the envelope. What do you do?

The House Dilemma

Some building developers have approached your parents. They want to buy your home and demolish it in order to build a research centre in which animal experiments will be conducted. They offer double the market value, which would make your family very rich. What would you try to convince your parents to do?

The Maths Test Dilemma

You have a maths test in a week's time. You think you'll do OK in it as you've been working hard all term. However, your friend is really worried as they've been finding the work really difficult. You're outside the school, and you find a brown envelope on the floor. Once at home in alone in your bedroom, you open it to discover it contains a copy of the dreaded maths test – your teacher must have dropped it. What do you do? Whom do you tell? Anyone?

The Birthday Present Dilemma

It's your birthday. Your best friend has been dropping hints for ages that they're getting you an amazing present, that they're getting it with their own pocket money, and that you're absolutely going to love it. When you open the present (in front of your friend), it's the ugliest t-shirt in the world. How do you react? Do you wear it?